The other four pits figured show a distinct paired arrangement, and suggest their origin from a single pit by division, like that seen in progress at x and y. To furnish a sufficient number of threads when a pit divides, the threads may possibly be able to divide or split longitudinally, an idea put forward by Russow. There is a good deal of similarity between the wall of the young Coniferous sieve tube and the lateral wall of a dicotyledonous sieve tube, such as is found in Phaseohis multiflorus and Cucurbita maxima where the thin-curved pit-closing membranes with the fan-like arrangement of threads separated by thick portions of the cell-wall also occur. A comparison has already been made (x 93) between ordinary dicotyledonous sieve tubes and those of the young seedling of Pinus pinea. With regard to the origin...
