Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: .by November 4th, and next day artillery firing was heard in the direction of Nashville, over forty miles away. Couriers met them soon and announced that the Confederates had been driven back from an attempt to burn the railroad bridge across the Cumberland at Nashville. Here John Morgan established his record for dishonorable warfare, taking advantage of a flag of truce to form troops near the works and dash into the town. But they were driven off, the bridge saved and Nashville let alone. Within ten days from the time of assuming command Rosecrans had reconstructed the railway and established headquarters at Nashville, and had formed his army into three wings--Major-General Aleck McDowell McCook commanding the right, Major-General Geo. H. Thomas the center, and MajorGeneral Thomas L. Crittenden the left. For the next forty days all were busy perfecting arrangements for a forward movement. Supplies of all kinds were hurried from the north and the few recruits ready were pushed on, thrust into blue clothes, given a musket, and informed they were soldiers of Uncle Sam s army-- Prepare to be shot. Upon the sloping hills south and east of Nashville the rows of white tents gave one of the most spirited of military pictures, and with brothers, husbands and lovers all driven away to the war, the women of Nashville had nothing to do but make it interesting for the Yankee army --and the arts and wiles of those keen-witted females kept provost marshals and...
