Excerpt: . ACT II. A beautiful palace-hall, half romance, half oriental. In the rear, a very wide glazed door opening upon terraces, beyond which the sea is seen blending with the sky. To the right, second entrance, a large open door shows a long retreating gallery, with airy colonnades and playing fountains. To the left, a stairway of porphyry descends from a heavy golden door. The marble floor is of snowy whiteness; it and the stairs are strewn with freshly cut lilies. A divan with many cushions. On the wall, by the door, hangs an enormous battle-axe, the handle of which is enamelled and set with green gems. SCENE I. THE PILGRIMS. As the curtain rises, the large glazed opening in the rear is closed. A group of pilgrims, in coarse dress covered with shells, holding each a staff and long green palms, is...
