When I was at the convent, my quarterly reports almost invariably ended with this definition of my moral character: Happy disposition, sound mind, gravity beyond her years, well-balanced nature. Conscience, however, a little uneasy. Conscience a little uneasy --I do not deny it; but as to the rest, asking pardon of these ladies, I must be allowed to assert the direct opposite. And as my beloved instructresses were mistaken, it is not astonishing that the world should be deceived also. I fancy that the cause of these false judgments is my external appearance. I am a dark brunette and pale; my expression, of a tiresome unchangeability, is as severe as that of a young girl can be. Somewhat pronounced near-sightedness lends a look of sleepy indifference to my black eyes (whoso brilliancy would without this...
